

To Whom it may concern,

I was informed at a Whitehorse wolf plan meeting to submit my thoughts by email, so here they are.

An incentive to trappers would be a very effective way of managing wolves, as long as the incentive was enough to get trappers out on the land. Trappers will certainly target wolves more and it would offer the Yukon an effective way to regain control of wolf populations. Wolves are a valued part of the Yukons wilderness and as such we need to take care of them. This is the most effective way to do so.

In Addition the Yukon could emulate Alaska and open a hunting season for wolves from aircraft. This would help decrease the time it is going to take to regain control of wolf populations and help trappers and hunters reach these animals in all area's.

Katie O'Farrell
Tagish Yukon